TISSUE SALTS SINGLES & COMPLEXES

A system of Micro-Dilution Therapeutics

The German physician Samuel Hahnemann articulated the principles of homeopathy in his famous work entitled the Organon of the Art of Healing in 1810. The word homeopathy is derived from the Greek roots “omio” (meaning the same) and “pathos” (meaning suffering). One of the principles of homeopathy is that the same entity which causes symptoms of disease in healthy subjects also is able to ameliorate those same symptoms in sick subjects. Hence Hahnemann’s theory “similia similibus curentur” or “Like cures like”. Modern medicine’s priority is to provide symptomatic relief to patients as a strategy to manage disease rather than to understand the basis of disease. Consequently, medicines developed based on that model target symptoms.

Acetaminophen is perhaps the most widely prescribed medicine today. Acetaminophen inhibits the formation of internal biochemical messengers (the prostaglandins) so that the symptoms (headache, pain, inflammation) are in the short term eliminated, however, the reasons for the headache, the pain or the inflammation are not addressed. By contrast homeopathy is a modality that seeks to restore health by understanding the underlying basis of disease.

Homeopathy contradicts the well known dose-response principles of pharmacology. In the case of homeopathy the exact opposite is apparently true – decreasing the dose increases the pharmacological response. Although there is no apparent empirical evidence that supports the plausibility of this theory, an analysis of some 107 controlled clinical trials of efficacy led Dutch researchers (J. Kleijnenhat ,et al., British Medical Journal, 1991) to conclude that there is a legitimate case for the further evaluation of homeopathy. Scottish researchers (D. Reilly, et al. Lancet, 1986) were able to conclude that the placebo effects can not adequately explain the successful clinical responses observed with homeopathic medicines. The mechanistic basis underlying the action of homeopathic medicines represents a confusing challenge to orthodox scientific models which must imply that homeopathy and homeopathic medicines must work by mechanisms other than what scientists currently understand. Medical research certainly acknowledges that the etiologies of most diseases are multifactorial and do not have one single cause or predisposing factor.

The first cellular response after injury is an instinctive attempt to regain biochemical “normality” or homeostasis. It is when the injury to cells exhausts this inherent “homeostatic” repair mechanism that irreversible injury occurs and disease manifests. In a similar way homeopathy is designed to re-establish homeostasis after acute or chronic injury. Homeostasis is a comprehensive line of well researched combinations, formulated by homeopathic practitioners for the well being of your family.”

Homeostasis is a concept that embraces the belief that given the appropriate nutrients, cells will strive to regain homeostasis and subsequent overall health will be restored naturally. Dr. Schuessler’s Biochemic System of Medicine calls for the use of tissue salts also known as minerals. Dr. Schuessler observed that when the human body lacks one of these tissue salts many common ailments may occur. All the tissue salts are prepared in a unique way by micro dilutions for the rapid cellular assimilation. Once deficient tissue salts are supplied in this specific form, cellular homeostasis is restored

RESULTING IN GOOD HEALTH.
